Dilophosauridae is a family of medium to large sized theropod dinosaurs. The name Dilophosauridae is derived from Greek, with "di" meaning "two," "lophos" meaning "crest," "sauros" meaning "lizard," and "idae" meaning "family". While the name suggests that all dilophosaurids have two crests, this is not applicable to all dilophosaurids.

The saurischian, or "lizard-hipped" dinosaurs, like all other tetrapods, had pelvises (hips) composed of three elements: the ilium, ischium, and pubis. What distinguishes saurischians (among other major characteristics; including a grasping hand, asymmetrical fingers, and a long, mobile neck) is the pubis that points downward and forward at an angle to the ischium.

Notes: Found in Mongolia, Saurornithoides was one of the most intelligent dinosaurs based upon its brain-weight to body-weight ratio. The fact that its eyes are situated pointing forward hints that, like many modern animals, Saurornithoides may have had stereoscopic vision, a characteristic that would have helped it to judge distance.
