With 70 percent of the world's population projected to live in cities by 2050 and our planet ever more impacted by human encroachment on the natural environment, the key to restoring balance between cities and nature is to understand the flow of resources in and out of, as well as within, the urban organism. The Urban Metabolism model offers ...

Collaboration and stakeholder engagement form a fertile ground for new solutions striving toward sustainable urban metabolism. Cities cannot act alone in their plans to advance climate actions and reshape their urban metabolism. Often, they control only a small portion of local greenhouse gas emissions, a fraction that rarely exceeds 25 percent.
